Message from the Chair
Jennifer Platt, University of Sussex

How do I study thee? Let me count the ways . . .

(with apologies to Elizabeth Barrett Browning)

How many ways are there to do the history of sociology? Probably more than you thought - certainly more than I thought, until I read some examples recently.

The first is the book marking the 50th anniversary of Katz and Lazarsfeld's Personal Influence (Simonson 2006). It presents 18 papers, by authors (including Elihu Katz himself) who come to the task with varying background knowledge and frames of comparative reference, and address different aspects. They discuss the contributions made by numbers of people behind the scenes, how one story about the data was eventually selected though others were equally possible, how it came about that the sample was entirely female but almost nothing was made of this in the book, how its reception depended on wider features of the contemporary social situation, and what its influence has been on the field and ideas such as 'mass society'. We all know in principle that different people will approach a book from different angles, but to have their angles demonstrated in a collective work is enriching; the focus on a single work allows a depth of understanding not otherwise possible. (Even good collections of researchers' accounts of their own projects, such as Sociologists at Work (Hammond 1964), or books by one author focusing on a single project such as Gillespie's excellent one on the Hawthorne experiments, do not have quite the same value.) It would be useful to see other examples treated in the same way - not necessarily such prominent ones; mundane and only moderately successful works are also of historical significance.

My second example uses systematic techniques for the analysis of textual materials. Clive Seale (forthcoming) makes a comparative keyword analysis of abstracts from the leading US and British journals of medical sociology for 1992-2007, in order to consider the direction of movement of medical sociology, the nature of the differences between the American and British styles, and the ways in which the subfield relates to general sociology. His method provides an overview of key features of large bodies of text with much less effort than conventional methods requiring coding. The technique starts by comparing the relative frequency of words in different bodies of text, highlighting those used significantly more often in one of them. Wordsmith software then allows those to be examined in their contexts, so that they can be grouped into meaningful themes characterising the contrasted bodies of text. In this way he shows that the US journal (Journal of Health and Social Behaviour) differs from the British one (Sociology of Health and Illness) in using more surveys (less ethnography and qualitative interviewing), more concepts from social psychology (less to do with the social construction of the self), more on ethnic and demographic divisions (less on class inequalities), and nothing (as compared with a considerable range of topics) on the medical profession. He goes on to compare the medical journals with the general ones from their national bases, and ends by concluding that American sociologists are more concerned with pressing social problems, while the British have a higher level of disciplinary introversion, with more theoretical concerns. (Eleanor Townsley's (2006) fascinating piece on the diffusion and meanings of the trope of the 'public intellectual' is not strictly on the history of sociology, its obvious relation to the recent outburst of discussion of Michael Burawoy's advocacy of 'public sociology' draws attention to the possibilities of the methods she uses - as she points out, offering 'a relatively unobtrusive way to observe intellectual practices...' - for the history of sociology.

My third example is Peter Baehr's (2002) book on the ideas of a sociological canon, founder or classic. He reviews critically some current usages and a wider literature, makes useful distinctions (for example, between founders of discourse and of institutions), discusses the idea of a classic text and how examples have qualified as such, and evaluates the use of 'canon' in disputes in social theory (which he concludes is inappropriate). The book is addressed to theory as much as to the history of sociology, but it is very suggestive for some aspects of how we should and should not do that.

My final example is a paper by Erin Leahey, on the contribution of subfield integration to sociological innovation. She chose a sample of sociology faculty, and studied their single-authored articles (identified from, and coded into subfields by, Sociological Abstracts). Where the codes for an article came from different 'families', it was deemed to span two or more subfields; this created her independent variable of subfield integration. The dependent variable was the number of citations received. She found that, after controlling for a large number of other variables, articles that integrated subfields were cited more (and not only because the audience was drawn from the two subfields), and interprets this as showing that they can be regarded as more innovative. They were also written more by women, younger authors, and authors from lower-ranked departments, and tended to appear in less prestigious journals. (There's hope for all of us!)

The data sources in these works have been imaginatively chosen to operationalize themes of interest. The topics range from the best choice of broad concepts to national differences in intellectual style; the units studied range from passages of text (studied for reasons other than their intentional messages) to the social history and intellectual content of a single research project; the methods used range from sophisticated statistical techniques applied to large bodies of electronically available data to personal reports on individual experience. Yes, all those can be valuable, and we're allowed to do them all - and more.

Proposed Changes to our ByLaws

When the ballot form comes round for the annual election of officers, you will see that this year we also have some proposals for changes to the Section By Laws. The wording may look a bit lengthy, but the basic issues raised are very straightforward. There are two matters where our By Laws have not kept up with our practice, and these proposals aim to correct that in the simplest way possible. The first correction is to formalise the existence of the Awards Committees, in parallel with our other standing committees, and the second is to add another formal graduate student representative to our Council membership. In addition, one new issue is raised; at last year's Business meeting it was felt that it would be desirable that the 'Distinguished Scholarly... Award' should not be only for a book, but might also be given for an article or chapter; the clause proposed is, therefore, worded 'Distinguished Scholarly Publication' to leave that possibility open.

Council also proposes that the Section dues for non-student members should be raised (next year) from $10 to $12. That would bring us into line with the majority of other Sections, and would, though a very small increase, make a noticeable improvement to our finances, since the Section would under ASA rules receive all of the addition. Recently the charges made by conference hotels for our annual reception, however modest that has been, have become crippling, leaving almost nothing for other activities; with just a little more we could start to consider possibilities relevant to our intellectual mission, such as paying some expenses for starting oral-history activity, or supporting graduate student attendance at meetings. Your Council urges you to vote in favour of all these amendments.

NEW JOURNAL

Journal of Scottish Thought

The inaugural issue of this journal is devoted to the career and works of Robert M. Maclver (1882-1970), the 30th President of the American Sociological Society in 1940. Educated in the Classics at the University of Edinburgh and at Oxford, Maclver was a lecturer in political science and sociology at the University of Aberdeen (1907-1915). In 1915 he moved to the University of Toronto, where he was head of the Department of Political Science. In 1927 he moved to Columbia University, where he was Lieber Professor of Political Philosophy and Sociology from 1929 until his retirement in 1950. He later served as President and Chancellor of the New School for Social Research (1963-1966). Prominent writings include the following: Community: A Sociological Study (1917); Society, Its Structure and Changes (1931), Social Causation (1942), The Web of Government (1947), and his autobiography, As A Tale That Is Told (1968).

THE MERTON CONFERENCE (AUGUST 9-10, 2007)

EDITOR'S NOTE: Last August, in conjunction with the annual ASA meeting in New York City, a two-day conference was held at Columbia University to examine the works of Robert K. Merton and to consider their relevance for contemporary sociology. In the comments that follow, Craig Calhoun, President of the Social Science Research Council, and the organizer of the Merton conference, discusses the rationale for the event, and provides details about the participants and a forthcoming publication based on the conference. L.N.

Robert K. Merton was among the most influential sociologists of the 20th century. He was the primary founder of the sociology of science, one of the clearest of all sociological theorists, and an innovator in empirical research methods. His work continues to be important in the study of social structure, social psychology, deviance, professions, organizations, and culture as well as perhaps most prominently science.

Yet for all the fame Merton's work is neither well understood nor very actively engaged in contemporary sociology. Certainly Merton's work is cited frequently in contemporary sociological publications, but usually in a fragmentary manner. In particular, his contributions to sociological theory, sociology of science, and specific empirical subfields are seldom brought together. His inquiries into social problems and applied sociology are largely ignored by those who examine his place in academic sociology or the history of theory.

The rejection of functionalism as a dominant paradigm in sociology contributed to a tendency to see Merton's work as part of an undifferentiated mass of functionalist theory, somewhat under the shadow of Talcott Parsons' attempts to systematize. Though Merton was a functional analyst, this categorization both misleads generally and obscures many specific contributions not dependent on functionalism or any other paradigm. One of the hallmarks of Merton's work was the effort to help theory and empirical advance without tying them to any single, encompassing larger system.

For these and many other reasons Merton's work is worth revisiting - or discovering - today. It speaks to the challenge of better integrating research and theory. It speaks to the importance of overcoming a sharp division between allegedly pure and applied sociology. Merton anticipated the current vogue for discerning causal mechanisms and situated this in a helpful perspective on "middle range theory". His work remains invaluable for the renewal of institutional perspectives in the sociology of science. And better understanding of Merton - and the Columbia School he and Paul Lazarsfeld led - is vital to understanding mid-20th century American sociology.

With these and a range of other concerns in mind, a group of currently active sociologists - most major leaders in the discipline - met just before the ASA meeting in August 2007 to examine the contemporary significance of Merton's work. Presenters included Charles Camic, Cynthia Epstein, Thomas Gieryn, Ragnvald Kalleberg, Aaron Panofsky, Alejandro Portes, Robert Sampson, Alan Sica, Peter Simonson, Charles Tilly, Stephen Turner, Viviana Zelizer, and Harriet Zuckerman. Others participated actively from the floor, including Elihu Katz, David Sills, and others with deep knowledge of Merton and 20th century sociology. Craig Calhoun organized the conference which was supported by the National Science Foundation and co-sponsored by the Social Science Research Council and Columbia University.

Papers presented at the conference addressed Merton's contributions to research methods and analytic approaches, Merton's "sociological semantics" and his contributions to the sociology of culture, Merton as a historian of science and as a figure in the history of sociology. Discussion included both appreciation and critique, assessment of how knowledge in various fields had advanced since Merton's era and considerations of how renewal of Mertonian insights, concepts, and lines of research could help it advance further today. These themes will be explored in a book to be published in 2009.

The importance of Merton's work is systematically obscured by the common practice of teaching sociology in three tracks: (1) general theory (often bundled with the history of sociology, and presented as the succession of theoretical orientations more than the cumulative development of explanatory power, (2) methods (focused heavily on techniques of statistical analysis, rather than "methodology" in the understanding of the how different methods work and how the choice of methods influences research, and (3) empirical subfields, each more or less disconnected from each other and from general theory and methods. It was a virtue of Merton's work to combine the three, and a recurrent feature of discussion at the conference was the extent to which scholars who knew Merton within one empirical subfield - deviance, for example, bureaucracy, or science - expressed surprise at learning how much of Merton they didn't know.

Craig Calhoun

Comments By Charles Crothers

The attendance was 50 or so throughout the two days. The line-up of speakers was almost all American; there was one Norwegian speaker. Their composition fell into three main categories:

- eminent sociologists (all former presidents of ASA or other American scholarly associations) who had been students or colleagues of Merton, whose addresses examined broad themes, but in which the relevance of Merton's work to their own work was brought out;
- distinguished historians of US sociology and sociologists of science, who examined particular features of the place of Merton in sociology in general, and the sociology of science in particular;
- young scholars whose work bore some relationship to that of Merton, although they tended to have only a passing acquaintance with his work.

The workshop accumulated a solid set of material on Merton and his influences. The eminent sociologists tended to show how their work interrelated with and was influenced by him. One impression was that in at least some areas, notably science, Merton's sociology may well be aging, and it may have become increasingly difficult for contemporary analysts to bring his analytical apparatus to bear on a fast-moving scene that is changing out of recognition.

One difficulty with such a gathering is that it is difficult to escape an appropriately somewhat celebratory stance to raise critical issues; only one speaker took an openly critical approach. Another difficulty was that many of the speakers were not particularly well-informed about Merton's work, and few engaged at all with the wide secondary literature on it. These varying threads meant that it was difficult to assemble a holistic picture of Merton and his work from the array of more specialist accounts which were developed. It was interesting to see those in the younger cohort try to come to grips with his approach. This signalled a growing distance, yet it is clear that the effort still remains worthwhile.

Foundations of Sociology Archive at Keele University

For many decades the archives of the Institute of Sociology, which worked in Britain in the first half of the 20th Century, have been kept in storage, but now Keele University is preparing to make them available. The Institute was the product of an earlier Sociological Society (founded in 1903), and other local/regional social organizations. Originally based in Le Play House in London, and later, during the Second World War, at a newly established Le Play House in Malvern, the Institute members were central in founding sociology in Britain, despite their virtual absence from the institutional history. They founded the Sociological Review, contributed to early university teaching of the subject, and published many books and papers. They included such people as Victor Branford, Alexander Farquharson, and Patrick Geddes, a figure of international importance in the history of modern town planning and environmental studies who pioneered a sociological approach to the study of urbanization.

When the Sociological Institute was dissolved, the full collection of Le Play House was given to Keele. This extends to over 15,000 publications, books, pamphlets, and hundreds of parcels and boxes containing archival material (over 150 linear meters) relating to life in English towns. For example, some of the material collected for the survey of Chester can be found on this website: <http://www.keele.ac.uk/depts/cr/fos%20le%20play/home-surveys/index.htm>, but the survey itself includes over fifty boxes of material for just that city. Data from the European surveys, some equally extensive, can be found at this link: <http://www.keele.ac.uk/depts/cr/fos%20le%20play/continental-surveys/ussr/1936.htm>.

The personal letters, biographical data, institutional correspondence, newspaper cuttings, draft speeches, reports of meetings, published plans, town and regional surveys, investigations of contemporary urban life (leisure activities of young people, 'pub-life' and public leisure activities; investigations into the living conditions, household arrangements, diet, work and entertainment activities of local communities in London and the provinces) should in time prove invaluable to a range of scholars working across the social sciences and the humanities. Not least, the collection sheds light on the thinking of key figures who developed the idea of 'thinking machines' that provided the essential starting point, and the underpinning of the philosophies of this group of scholars, who drew support for their intellectual endeavors from important academic, political and social figures such as Galton, H.G. Wells, and Winston Churchill.

The sheer volume of information has held back its dissemination to the wider academic community, but with digitization of some of the archive's contents, and the generous support of The Sociological Review/Keele University, cataloguing can now begin. The development of the archive is under the stewardship of Professor Sue Scott, but if you are interested in hearing more about it please contact either Barry Godfrey or David Amigoni.

SUPPORT STUDENT MEMBERSHIPS

In an effort to increase our membership, and to get the work of HOS out to graduate students and the work of more graduate students into HOS, the Section invites contributions from members to support student membership (we are not allowed to use our ASA funding for this purpose). If you know graduate students who would be interested, we continue to encourage you to sponsor memberships for them directly. However, for members who do not know any, this is an opportunity to sponsor graduate students elsewhere who might have a lot to offer, and for whom HOS could be an important opportunity.

Over the winter, we will be contacting graduate departments across the country and asking them to recommend Section membership to their students, particularly those enrolled in Classical Theory courses, and the Section will offer to support as many of those memberships as we can. Student membership is only $5; we welcome contributions in any multiple of this amount to support the student membership endeavor.

Section on History of Sociology Mission Statement

The purpose of the Section on the History of Sociology is to provide a forum for sociologists and other scholars interested in the study of the historically specific processes shaping the development of sociology as a profession, an academic discipline, an organization, a community, and an intellectual endeavor. The Section serves its members as a structure 1) to disseminate information of professional interest, 2) to assist in the exchange of ideas and the search for research collaborators, 3) to obtain information about the location of archival materials, 4) to support efforts to expand such research resources and to preserve documents important to the history of sociology, and 5) to ensure that the scholarship of this group can be shared with the profession through programming at both regional and national meetings.

6. SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH COUNCIL ARCHIVES

The Social Science Research Council archives are arranged into two record groups distinguished by the date of their donation to the Archive Center. Accession 1 consists of the documents received by the Archive Center in 1990; Accession 2 contains the second and larger bulk of material that was transferred to the Archive Center in 1994. Much of the work of the SSRC was conducted by committees, a fact which is reflected in the organization of the SSRC's records. In both Accession 1 and Accession 2, the largest series is Series 1, Committee Projects, 1924-1990, and the description of that series in both accessions below lists the names of the committees that appear as subseries (35 subseries in Accession 1 and 106 subseries in Accession 2).

ACCESSION 1

Series 1. Committee Projects, 1924-1990, 122.4 cu. ft. This series is divided into thirty-five subseries, each representing a different committee. Each subseries contains conference papers and annual minutes of that committee.
